New Technologies, Labour and Discriminatory Practices

Technology is increasingly affecting the world of work, particularly in terms of business organisation and management processes. In consideration of the changes brought about by technological advances, the editors of E-Journal of International and Comparative Labour Studies (EJCLS) invite authors to submit papers examining the possible discriminatory practices resulting from the use of technology and how labour law and anti-discrimination legislation can protect workers.

Particularly, the editors welcome research contributing to the following themes:

- Algorithmic Discrimination and Work: main issues, protection strategies, law and enforcement strategies, and case studies discussing discrimination resulting from algorithmic management at work;
- Discrimination, Employability and the Labour Market: possible impacts on the labour market, discriminatory practices, policy and regulation managing the digital transition;
- Access to Social Rights, Discrimination and the Digital Divide: challenges stemming from the digital divide in terms of social rights.

Papers must have a length of 50 000 characters. They must be written in English and submitted through the journal's platform or by email (ejcls@adapt.upr.es) by 30 April 2022. They must be sent using the journal's template and in line with the relevant guidelines, which are available here. An abstract – 1 000 characters, spaces included – should also be provided. Papers will undergo peer review and, if accepted, will be published in issue no. 2/2022 of the EJCLS.
